

Demand Out-Distances Supply in Every Line

Financial Editors Almost Unanimous in Commenting on Abnormal Commercial Condition of Today, Resulting From Prosperity.

That prosperity has made America's commercial condition abnormal seems to be the consensus of opinion of the press of the country. The financial editors are almost unanimous today in declaring that the demand has far out-distanced the supply in almost every branch of commerce.

Regarding the condition of the steel market, the New York Sun has this to say:

The demand for rolled steel products, especially for steel bars, plates and shapes, continues most active, with heavy tonnages going begging. Both dealers and consumers find it unusually difficult to place contracts with the mills for bars and plates, especially for delivery during the third quarter of the year. Although it is not a question of price, more sales of several thousand tons have been made at premiums of several dollars a ton for shipment over the second quarter of the year.

The following comment on the dry goods market in today's issue of the New York Times gives food for thought:

Tucked away among the advertisements in fine type, under the heading of "Buyers' Wants" in the Times the other day, was one from a mail order house which ranks among the largest in the country. It said: "Gingham wanted; checks and stripes; quantity no object. Cash." That little advertisement was a true and very forcible symptom of the usual conditions now existing in the textile markets. In normal times a place like the one advertising would place its order in advance with the manufacturers and would get its deliveries as called for. If business turned out a little brisker than expected, a repeat order—especially if the goods were staple ones—would hurry along the extra amount needed. Just now this cannot be done as to very many constructions. The mills have been selling all they could make and they have no stock goods on hand. Those who want more, particularly of colored goods, must get them where they can, and in such quantities as are available, if any are. This set of facts mirrors the conditions. An enlarged demand has come at a time when producing facilities cannot meet it. Advancing prices are merely a concomitant without any effect in lessening the demand. The extension of the wave of prosperity keeps increasing the buying disposition, as well as the buying power of the people, and there is no immediate prospect of its being checked.

The New York Herald confines itself to reporting the views of a well-known brokerage house:

"The newly developed optimism in financial circles is steadily gaining impetus," says Harvey A. Willis &

Co. "The week just ended has been the best market since the new year came in. Existing conditions are each day giving confirmatory evidence of the accuracy of the recent diagnosis of the situation made by those who closely analyzed its controlling forces."

The New York World finds reason for optimism in the lessening of the tension in the United States' relations with Germany in the following excerpt:

With the removal of the Lusitania question as a factor of disturbance, the investment and speculative markets now seem to be shaking themselves for a more natural response to the remarkably favorable financial, business and commercial outlook. While the period of devaluation, so pregnant with evil potentials, was progressing through its varied phases neither the public nor the professional element among the traders cared to assume commitments involving hazards which could not be minimized by a quick shift of position. The restraining influence of this irritating international problem undoubtedly extended much beyond the scope of Wall Street. Upon every line of trade, with the exception of those engaged directly or indirectly in the production of munitions and military supplies, it imposed a spirit of caution, if not of hesitation. The wisdom of the President in declining to involve this country in a diplomatic campaign over the definition of a word or the interpretation of a phrase is, therefore, applauded by business men without respect to political creeds or affiliations. Who were nevertheless prepared to support him to a man if necessary to the conservation of the nation's dignity and the preservation of its honor.

The New York American sounds a word of warning to Wall Street in the following:

But serious students of the market look with apprehension on the opening of spring in Europe. It is well known the allies have not attempted an offensive movement, not having sufficient ammunition. Now they are prepared, and what may happen somewhere in France within the next month is quite likely to stagger humanity.

How will the stock market withstand such a shock, and especially if the Germans prove victorious? For it must in honesty be admitted that the stock market is on the side of the allies. This is not an opinion. It is the record of a fact as proved by a score of incidents since the war began.

Heavy purchases of stock now mean the purchaser believes the allies will be successful in their proposed offensive. Few generals on either side would be so bold as to take such a decided stand. Wall Street is likely to taste the war more intimately before long.

age is shown by the confidence expressed in the situation by the Journal. "Last January comparatively little construction work was contemplated."

Developments in the steel trade have not tended in the past week to mitigate the unprecedented conditions that prevail. On the contrary they have made more severe and intense factors that have governed for some time. The present outlook is such that the trade feels that it is assured of operations at maximum capacity during the whole of the present year.

Demand on the steel mills by customers is insistent to the last degree, and is an much beyond the capacity of mills that many producers are protesting deliveries.

One factor that has arisen and now threatens to seriously curtail, if it does not actually stop, the operations of some of the smaller companies, is the rapid advance in the price of iron-manganese. This necessary alloy sold during the past week at high as $20 per ton, compared with $10 a ton the week previous, which was then $10 above the highest price it had been in the last decade.

With actual sales of copper metal being made at 23 cents for particular deliveries, the highest price for the metal has been obtained in forty years, or since the closing year of the civil war and the years immediately following. In July, 1914, the average price of Lake copper was 44 cents, and the average price for the year 1915 was 44 cents. By May, 1916, the price had fallen to 35 cents, but in April, 1916, it was again above 40 cents. These prices, however, were made in the period of devaluation of currency, and are not comparable with prices quoted subsequent to the resumption of specie payments in 1913.

At present the producers can sell all the copper metal that they can deliver, and there is already talk of a further rise in the price to 30 cents.

The bright note in current prosperity is the marked expansion in domestic business.

Says Bradstreet's:

"Another busy week, busier, perhaps, than ever before at this season, is indicated by reports this week."

"Business in the East keeps on broadening. In the West the presence of many buyers of spring goods makes for marked activity in house trade. In the Northwest unfavorable weather conditions result in greater demands on jobbers."

"In parts of the South activity is not up to expectations, probably because cotton is being held, and in part because of the effects of high water in navigable streams."

"The far Northwest is winning out over unprecedented snowstorms, which, however, preclude good future prospects for farmers in regard to water power."

Says Days Review:

"Less dependence is placed upon foreign business as internal demands show greater expansion. War contracts still bulk large, but strictly domestic requirements are an increasingly potent factor and provide a more substantial basis for permanent progress."

"General requests for prompt shipments indicate the urgency of current needs."

"Retail movements of reasonable merchandise, though varying with the weather, bulk heavy in the aggregate, but chief interest in distributing channels now centers on the brilliant prospects for spring trade."

"The disposition to enter upon forward commitments is a prominent feature in all important lines."

Washington, D. C., February 7, 1916. The Washington Times. Classified Advertising Manager.

Dear Sir—My friend's birthday occurred last week and I was sorely puzzled as to what I should give him. However, The Washington Times ad of Walford's, located at 909 Pa. ave. decided me. I presented my friend with one of the finest sweaters, which pleased him greatly.

I was simply delighted with my purchase bought at Walford's, delighted both with the price and quality of the sweater. I take extreme pleasure in recommending Walford's to the Washington Times readers. Sincerely,

I consider PROF. H. N. D. PARKER's method of treating chronic diseases the best in use. In fact, it is the only specific that can be applied to a given place on the body and confined to the one place only. My experience has shown me that the method is very efficacious, very specific, and entirely under the control of the operator. I was without support, and for years I was obliged to carry a cane.
